

COUNTY FLOATS ARE FEATURES OF ANNUAL PARADE

Daly City, Colma, and San Mateo county figured prominently in the Admission Day parade in San Francisco last Tuesday, lending their aid to making the parade one of the best in history.

One of the units of the parade that attracted much attention was that of the covered wagon escorted by Colma residents, representing cowboys and cowgirls. The covered wagon, with its four black horses, was followed by about thirty cowboys, and members of the Mission Riding Club, and a number of children on ponies.

The San Mateo county Boy Scout band led the division made up of San Mateo, Santa Cruz and Santa Clara county marchers.

One of the San Mateo county floats depicted the havoc wrought to the redwoods by ax and fire. The Santa Cruz float carried out the same theme and the Santa Clara float emphasized the value of the forest as a playground and recreation spot.

A special train, labeled "Butano Special," carried throngs from Santa Cruz to San Francisco, with stops at Palo Alto and Redwood City to gather additional delegates for the annual demonstration.

Governor Young, Mayor Rolph, J. T. Newell, grand president of the Native Sons, and Estelle Evans, grand president of the Native Daughters, had prominent places in the parade.

The celebration closed with a literary program at the San Francisco city hall, where Archbishop Edward J. Hanna delivered the invocation and the Rev. David Todd Gilmer pronounced the benediction.

The parade was made colorful by companies of the Thirteenth infantry and marines and sailors from the U. S. S. Langley. More than one hundred and fifty units of Native Sons and Native Daughters also marched with other organizations, including the Covered Wagon Babies, Association of California Pioneers, and the California Grays.

MINIATURE COURSE OPENED SATURDAY

The Daly City miniature golf course, located at 6219 Mission street, was opened last Saturday. John J. Fahey spent nearly $3,500 to build this tricky layout. In his desire to give Daly City a beautiful and difficult course, Mr. Fahey has succeeded above his wildest dreams.

Par for the eighteen holes is 52. In order to shoot anywhere near perfect figures, the average golfer is called to display every ounce of his ability. The fact that less than a score of players have equaled or broken par gives you some idea of how tough it is.

Unlike many of the peewee courses, the local grounds include several flower beds and other ornaments pleasing to the eyes. Stura Brothers, architects and builders, co-operated with the management to beautify any extra space. A visit to the lot should convince you that they have made an excellent job. The entire course is well lighted. Eight 1500 watt bulbs erected on 25-foot poles furnish the desired illumination.

The following building permits were issued by City Clerk B. C. Ross during the month of August:

The estate of Omero Barsotti, who died in Colma, September 2, will be shared by two Colma relatives, Frank and Josephine Barsotti, according to the petition for letters of administration filed in the Superior Court last Wednesday. The estate is valued at less than $10,000. Other heirs listed are Emma Rosaia, Seattle, Wash., Edith de Vecchi, San Francisco, and Elizabeth Pietronave, Oakland.

DALY CITY ENJOYS LOWER TAX RATE

At a meeting of the City Council, held last Monday evening, a resolution was adopted fixing the tax rate for Daly City for the coming year at $1.40 per $100 assessed valuation, the lowest rate enjoyed since 1915 by the taxpayers of this community.

This low tax rate, together with the exceptionally low assessed valuation placed on property, accounts for a lower tax than in probably any other community in California.

A communication was received from the Daly City Merchants' Association asking for a copy of the proposed new plumbing ordinance. This matter was referred to the ordinance committee, and the Council was advised that the ordinance would be ready for its first reading next meeting night, and that a copy would be sent to the Merchants' Association.

A communication was received from the California League of Municipalities, stating that they will hold a convention in the city of Long Beach, October 6 to 11. Every city official, elective or appointive, is invited. For the first time in the League's history a stenographic record will be kept of the discussions taking place, and the entire proceedings will be published in book form.

The Board of Fire Commissioners sent in a report, advising the Council of the resignation of Firemen J. Schmitt and H. Wendell, both of Station No. 1.

The Pacific Gas and Electric Company asked permission to install a 16-inch high pressure line, within the curb, on the west side of Mission street, from a point opposite Gambetta street north to Westlake avenue, and west on Westlake avenue to Junipero Serra boulevard. This is necessary so that the San Francisco pumping plant at Lake Merced can be supplied with gas. This matter was referred to City Engineer Klassen, with instructions to try to work out a plan that would do away with cutting any pavement.

A communication was received from Mr. A. G. Robertson, asking permission to move a small dwelling from 180 Hillcrest Drive across the street. This was taken under advisement.

The fire committee reported that they had met with the Board of Fire Commissioners and that topics of importance to the fire department were discussed.

The library committee reported that 3,100 books had been distributed during last month.

The monthly report of the health officer was read and ordered filed.

NORTH END SEWER PLANS APPROVED

Proceedings toward the construction of the proposed $126,000 outfall sewer system for San Bruno, Lomita Park, Capuchino and part of South San Francisco were initiated with the adoption of a resolution of intention to form the district by the San Mateo county board of supervisors last Wednesday morning.

The supervisors then set Tuesday, September 30, as the date for hearing protests against the proposed system.

Wednesday's meeting of the board of supervisors was an adjourned one, action on the sewer project having been delayed Monday due to the absence of Supervisors C. V. Thompson and Thomas L. Hickey.

On Wednesday afternoon the supervisors proceeded with the opening and canvassing of some 140 "absent votes" cast at the primary election.

"MISTAKES OF SAUL" IS SERMON TOPIC

Grace Presbyterian church, with her unusual endowment of musical talent, plans soon to render a classical duet by Mildred Roof and Mildred Swan, entitled "Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody." Last Sunday a quartet sang "I Know That My Redeemer Lives."

Sunday evening, at 7:45, the pastor will preach on "The Mistakes of Saul," mistakes which are commonly repeated today.

Sunday school rally day will be observed in the early part of October. This will be the children's day, and a lively program is being prepared for that day.

MERCHANTS LOSE BY LARGE MARGIN

The Mission Reds snowed the Daly City Merchants under an avalanche of hits last Sunday, winning by a 17 to 5 score, at Jackson Park.

The local nine's ambition to win their seventh straight game was blasted when they went "haywire" in several departments. These facts are more noticeable when one considers the brand of ball the Merchants have been playing in the past.

Gene Keagle's pitching was not up to the usual standard. He was relieved in the second inning after nine runs had crossed the plate. This was the first time in Gene's career that he ever lost his effectiveness so early in any contest.

Although the Merchants were not charged with a fielding error, several fly balls hit to left field should have been caught. Staglich had no less than six chances and failed to convert one of them into an out.

Most of the local base-runners acted like wild rabbits on the paths, especially when Daly City was far in the rear. Three good chances to score were thrown away by poor running, or coaching.

The Mission club wasted only one of their seventeen hits in scoring seventeen runs. They tallied four times in the first inning, five in the second, two in the third, and six in the fourth. A brace of Mission batters collected three bingles in four times at bat, as did Rettig, local shortstop.

Daly City will play the O'Brien, Sportorno & Mitchell nine Sunday. The poultrymen hold two close decisions over the Merchants, and will be favored to repeat in another close contest.

MANY THOUSANDS LOSE LIVES BY FIRE

"Home, Sweet Home," played by orchestras, or sung as a solo or chorus. How many times we have listened to an exquisite rendering of that beautiful song. "Home, Sweet Home," which has thrilled millions in generations past and will for ages to come send the red blood throbbing in the hearts of millions.

It has brought to you happy days spent in the old home of parents, of friends, and sweet reminiscences that live as a dream.

The safety of loved ones and the protection of that home from destruction by fire naturally appeals to you. Now let us stop and think a moment. There are an average of 845 homes that are burning every day in the United States and Canada, and all due largely to carelessness. Also fire destroys $1,000 worth of property every minute of the day and night, and the percentage of fires in dwellings was greater last year than ever before, and these in the places that should be free from catastrophes. And seven out of every ten times the fire departments were called out, it was to prevent the home fires burning.

But of greater interest to you is the fact that eight out of every ten could have been prevented by properly correcting hazardous conditions, such as disorder, accumulations of rubbish and litter, defective heating equipment, faulty construction, and the exercise of care and cleanliness.

It is estimated that about 10,000 people lose their lives each year by fire. And about twice as many are crippled or maimed by the same cause. Two-thirds of this loss of life occurs in our homes, and are women and children, and aged and infirm people. And the most distressing fact is that over 80 per cent of these fires result from what? Thoughtlessness, carelessness, indifference, ignorance, or call it what you may. And are preventable. In other words, we ourselves, individually and collectively, are responsible.

Interest yourself first in your own home and premises. Clean up existing fire hazards. Instruct your family in the lessons which may some day save their lives. Banish carelessness from your own home. Then when out in your community spread the message of Fire Prevention to your fellow citizens to awaken the spirit that will make your community fire safe. Every individual interest counts in creating public opinion.

As I have stated, most fires can be prevented. The physical factors which cause and spread fires are understood, and they are gradually being controlled. But no organization exists which can control the spirit of American carelessness. That is the work upon which we as individuals should concentrate. That is our problem. The solution is in our hands. It is up to every one of us to do our part.

Don't permit rubbish to accumulate in basements, work shops, or anywhere about the premises, as clean property seldom burns. Don't burn trash or rubbish near buildings, fences, or other property, or permit children to do so. Don't use gasoline, or benzine, to clean clothing near an open light or fire. Use non-flameable cleanser.

Yours for more fire prevention.
Lieut. Robert J. Hatch, Bay Shore Fire Department.

By Vic Savelly, Fire Prevention Bureau of San Mateo County.

"LOST" OFFICER FOUND WANDERING NEAR COLMA

Norman N. Holland, special policeman attached to the Southern Pacific station, was found in a dazed condition beside the Pedro Mountain road near Colma. Holland was taken to the South San Francisco hospital by Constable S. A. Landini and State Traffic Officer Otto Schramm. There he admitted he had been drinking heavily. His admission dispelled reports that he may have been the victim of revenge of gangsters, which arose when he disappeared several days previous.

SAN FRANCISCO MAY SPEND MILLIONS IN THIS COUNTY

San Francisco will vote on two bond issues in November for a total of $4,850,000, to be spent in San Mateo county. An issue of $4,000,000 will be on the ballot for proposed improvements and extensions at Mills Field, San Francisco's municipal airport at San Bruno. Another for $850,000 will be submitted to the voters for the erection of a new county jail, somewhere in northern San Mateo county. The new building is proposed to replace the Ingleside jail, condemned as a fire trap.

TWO BIG BANKS HAVE COMBINED THEIR RESOURCES

Two great California banking institutions, one of them rooted in pioneer soil and the other born and reared in the vibrant sweep of the last quarter century, have combined their resources and all other physical assets to form the largest financial organization West of New York. They are the Bank of Italy, chief of the nation's branch banking institutions, and the Bank of America of California, which started under another name when the state was still caught in the gold lure, and has gone forward sturdily to achieve primacy in its far-flung field.

The Transamerica Corporation, holding company for the two institutions, announced the consolidation in a formal statement issued from its San Francisco office. This statement is as follows:

"Plans looking to the consolidation of the Bank of America of California with the Bank of Italy under the name Bank of America National Trust and Savings Association, an institution ranking as the fourth largest in the United States, and one of the world's most powerful financial organizations, were announced following a joint dinner of directors of Bank of Italy and Bank of America on September 3.

"This marks the culmination of a plan conceived by A. P. Giannini when the Bank of America of California was formed two years ago. The consolidation includes the Bank of Italy, with resources of approximately one billion dollars, and the Bank of America of California, with resources of $350,000,000, and, through control by Transamerica Corporation of both the newly consolidated institution in California and the Bank of America in New York with its $500,000,000 resources, in effect inaugurates the establishment of a nation-wide banking organization.

"Details of the consolidation are to be worked out by a committee consisting of A. P. Giannini, James A. Bacigalupi, C. R. Bell, W. E. Blauer, Leon Bocqueraz, H. R. Erkes, L. M. Giannini, P. C. Hael, Marco Hellman, Orta Monnette, W. F. Morrish, A. J. Mount, E. J. Nolan, A. Pedrini, Geo. A. Webster, R. R. Yates."

All of those named in the Transamerica statement are well known California bankers. Mount is the president of the Bank of Italy and Bacigalupi is its former president. E. J. Nolan is president of the Bank of America. L. M. Giannini is the son of A. P. Giannini and several months ago succeeded his father as the president of Transamerica Corporation. Bocqueraz is the former president of the United Security Trust and Savings Bank, the predecessor in interest of the Bank of America.

The Bank of Italy has 292 branches in 165 California cities, while the Bank of America operates 162 branches in approximately 100 cities. The headquarters of the first named institution are in San Francisco, while the administrative functions of the Bank of America are directed from Los Angeles.

In a number of cities there are branches of both banks, and the details involved in providing for these dual establishments will be one of the chief considerations of the consolidation committee. Under the new set-up it will be necessary for the consolidated institution to surrender the state charter of the former Bank of America and operate under a national charter.

The reference to a nation-wide banking system in the Transamerica statement is occasioned by the fact that the holding corporation owns three large banks outright, one in New York and two in California, controls the First National Bank of Portland, Oregon, and holds interests in a number of other banking institutions.

The consolidation is the biggest and most important merger of banking interests in the history of the West, and gives the nation a branch banking institution that approaches in size and scope the famous branch banking establishments of the Old World and of Canada.

AUTO VICTIM LAID TO REST

Interment was in the Italian cemetery at Lawndale.

Lifeguard William Culling, of Oshawana, Ontario, will probably have a steady job as long as young Wilfrid Duffield hangs around the lake front. Twice in one day recently Culling rescued the boy from drowning, once when he fell off the dock, and again when he got beyond his depth while bathing.

Another illustration of the fact that dignity and salary do not necessarily go together is given by a writer in the Pathfinder, who notes that a second lieutenant in the army gets $200 a year less than a private in the Washington fire or police department.

According to a recently published story, Edison's early scientific ideas did not always work. As a boy he learned that very light grass would ascend, so he figured that a big dose of Seidlitz powder would cause a playmate, Michael Gates, to fly. Instead, it gave Michael the sensation of being a balloon securely anchored to earth.

War within seven years is predicted by those who believe in signs and omens. A locust with a yellow W on its back recently found in Clarksdale, Miss., is said to foretell the coming event. Similar locusts were seen before the Mexican, Civil, Spanish-American and World wars, old-timers declare.

Athletic training may sometimes be put to practical use, as was done by Clarence DeMar, noted Marathon runner, a few days ago. Missing a train while on his way to deliver a lecture, he ran thirty-eight miles to catch one at another town and filled his engagement on scheduled time.

Although no invalid, President Cooke of Kansas City's Columbia National Bank was recently conveyed from a train to a New York hotel in a wheel chair, covered with Pullman blankets. Reason: While the only suit he had with him was being pressed in another car, said car was disconnected from his train and shunted to another part of the terminal yard.

Regardless of whether we heed advice to reach for this or that, the people of the United States spend more money for sweets than they do for electricity in their homes, according to figures of the Department of Commerce. The candy bill is a little more than two cents a day for each person, while the electric bill for those in electrified homes is a little less than two cents a day for each person, on an average.

Some record trees are described in a recent magazine thus: The fastest growing tree is the eucalyptus; the lightest the ambach of Egypt; the oldest is a cypress in Mexico, at least 6,000 years old; the tallest are gum trees found in Australia, ranging from 470 to 500 feet in height, but the giant Sequoia of California are perhaps the heaviest.

Motoring accidents caused about 31,000 deaths in the United States last year, an appalling total. But staying at home was only a little less dangerous than motoring, for 23,000 were killed in accidents in and about the home, principally from slipping in bathtubs and on rugs, burns and explosions. Even at home one must watch his step.

The New York state authorities have upheld the contention of a mother that the date of a child's birth should be recorded by standard time. Her baby was born and recorded at the hospital as occurring at 12:30 a. m. May 1, by daylight saving time. She insisted that its birthday was April 30, as it was born at 11:30 p. m. standard time on that date. The authorities agreed with her.

Getting the wrong telephone number is not unusual, though not so common as jokesmiths would have us believe. But a London telephone girl had reason to say "Excuse it please" with unusual humility when she recently connected a subscriber with Chile instead of Argentina. It is said to be the first case of giving a patron the wrong country.

BETHEL FULL GOSPEL MISSION

We are pleased to announce to our friends of Daly City that Evangelist G. Wagle Angiel will preach at the Bethel Full Gospel Mission next Sunday night, and all are cordially welcome. His topic will be "Eagles."

We have had the privilege of hearing Brother Angiel before in our assembly, and he certainly preaches a Gospel that is "so high you can't get over it; so deep you can't get under it, and so wide you can't get around it." Friends, he preaches a Christ that is able for every circumstance. Brother Angiel is a converted Buddhist. He followed this religion of the East for fifty-three years, then one night, twenty-seven years ago, God wonderfully saved him. Come and hear about it from his own lips.

God is blessing us in a mighty way since opening June 1 of this year. The assembly has been growing, strangers are coming in, and the Lord is saving souls and getting us ready for His soon coming. Dear reader, are you ready to meet Him?

The sermon next Sunday morning at 11 A. M. will be "Missionary Work, and What Bearing it Has on the Second Coming of Christ."

Early in February he said to Will one day, "This is my birthday."

"It is?"

"Yes—I'm sixty-five—but I feel ninety-five. Will, I'm through."

"You're through?"

"Yes; I'll never draw another line. I can't work any more."

There was no questioning the sincerity of his tone. Will found himself accepting this statement as true. Mr. Poole was through. It would be idle to argue or to cajole him.

"Well," he said after a little, "this is the end of Poole and Todd, then."

"Yes," answered his partner heavily, "it's the end."

After a few minutes of silence, Will got up and began to pack away the drawing boards, to sort out pencils, rack up the stiff cardboard sketches and set the office in order.

"I'd like to go to Florida—where it's warm," said Poole dreamily. "I've been cold for months."

Will looked at him queerly. He felt sad. The old man was, in his own eyes, a failure. He did not feel, nor was he warmed by, the praise or the recognition of others. Long afterward Will felt that in that moment he had known the cold and clammy breath of death. The death of activity, of hope; the yielding of some long-loved and never-forgotten dream.

"Let's have a party at Pastano's to-night. Mostano's in town—and McDermott would come. Do you think Ernestine would be my guest—at Pastano's?"

"I think so, John. She'd do most anything for you."

"Ernestine"—the old man seemed to wander—he paused a long time, and looked at Will with a faint shining of the old intelligence in his face. "Will, put those d—d pasteboards down and come here—I want to tell you something. It was Loring Hamilton that had you fired from the Sun. He had Wiston's affairs in his hands—they were thicker than anyone knew, and Wiston had reason to please Loring. Wiston got tight one night and told it. And lost his job for it. McDermott will be friendly to you, if you take any work to him."

"Don't worry about me, John."

"I'm not worrying, you young devil. I want to tell you, though, about Loring. Watch out for him. He's got power now, in a way. He's going to London next year for Pastano. He's the prince of the bootleggers now. Pastano is using him recklessly. He doesn't give a d—n for Loring—will probably ruin him in the end. But Pastano does care about you—and about Ernestine."

"What Loring does is nothing to me. Like most mean things, it worked out for the best. I mean—you can't do a dirty trick as easily as you think. I've come farther this way than if I had stayed on the Sun."

The old man left to go and make arrangements for his party, and Will, after a brief telephone conversation with Ernestine, pitched into the files. It was late afternoon when he went home and as he went he was turning over in his mind the possibilities for the future. His enthusiasm had gripped a new idea. Ernestine would not like this. But he could do well for himself. He could!

"After all," he said to himself, swinging along among the small tidy houses, "after all, I was in danger of becoming a copyist. I've learned all that Poole can teach me. It's time for me to work alone—to develop my own ideas."

Ernestine was dressing, and giving instructions to the neighbor girl who was to stay with the children.

"What do you think, Will? Shall I wear my red dress? I thought I would never go to Pastano's again. It's years, though, since we went, and I don't mind going a bit. Will, you aren't listening to me. I've been so vexed with Peter. He's had two whippings, and needed a third. He's getting too big for me to spank any more. I wish you'd take a little paddle to him."

Will stood in amazement in the middle of the bedroom, his tie in his hands, looking back at the bright reel of memory—himself and Ernestine walking on Clark street in a late snow—going into Pastano's. How his heart had burned that night at Loring and Lillian—at all of them stirring Ernestine against him. Why had he cared? He didn't care now. He was singularly unmoved by the pronouncement that Loring had forced Wiston's hand, and Wiston had seized the first excuse to dismiss him. He realized with a shock that his resentment against Loring had always been personal—from the time he had been a little boy dragging a brace, and Loring had been a big boy, strong and robust and always teasing Ernestine and pulling at her hair. It was because Loring had despised him—not because of Ernestine. It had been Loring's strength and hardness that he had hated, not Loring's attention to his wife. How strange to think that his jealousy had been for himself and not for her. His self-esteem had suffered, not his love.

He became conscious of Ernestine's voice, querulous with Peter who protested against being put to bed. Ernestine ought not take that annoyed, vexed tone with the boy. He realized that he had heard her speak so to Peter frequently, of late. If Peter were naughty he should be punished, not hectored. Will took the boy from his mother.

"Go and get dressed," he said to her in a tone of command which astonished her. "You're always scolding the kid about something. Ever since Elaine came he's in trouble. You can't expect a healthy boy to go on tiptoe all his life because he has a sick sister. Go on and dress, and I'll take care of him. Be quiet, Peter, or I'll punish you. Not another word."

"He's just like you, and your family," Will told Ernestine. "He is willful and energetic and intelligent and strong. He wants his own way. Instead of dealing with him firmly you quarrel with him. You should not permit him the equality of an argument, and I want you to stop it, Ernestine."

Recollections of a dozen times when Will had been high-handed with her rushed over Ernestine.

"So you don't allow the Briceblands equality?" she asked in a cold rage, finding it difficult to take correction from him.

"It's just as well for us to understand one thing at a time without going into another," answered Will calmly. "If I think you are taking the wrong tone with Peter, I'll say so. It's my right."

They left the house and walked to the car line in silence. They sat beside each other in the car, they walked toward Pastano's, together in flesh, remote in spirit. The strong satisfaction of inner activity shone on Will's face, and it was like a declaration of war to Ernestine. Her anger grew until she could not remember when she had burned with such resentment.

She was excessively courteous to every one at the dinner party. John Poole told her of his plans for Florida, of the end of his agreement with Will. Ernestine was astonished.

"Why didn't you tell me?" she demanded, turning to Will, and he answered her:

"We didn't have a chance to talk."

Ernestine felt that Pastano's was bad medicine for her. She was unhappy again.

At home, later, she spoke to Will somewhat timidly.

"Are we going to be enemies, Will? So many married people are foes—bitter, unforgiving. Lillian and Loring are in continual conflict. He must dominate her every move. He's the one to say where they will go, what they will eat, whether or not they will have children. I'm willing to accept what you said about Peter—only, let's keep our unity."

"You know I will never love anyone but you, Ernestine," he said impatiently, "but I've got a big job on my hands now. Don't be neurotic. I've got to swing this thing, and you mustn't be emotional if my mind is on my job instead of on sentimentalities. Anyhow, what are you talking about? Nothing's changed."

She was silent. As he sat on the edge of the bed smoking, she finally closed her eyes against his immobility, turned her head on her pillow and tried to sleep, but burning tears slid underneath the lids.

Will was only slightly aware of her weeping. He seemed to have entered into a new and stimulating plane of existence. He had passed out of the role of adorer and slave for Ernestine, he thought, with some indefinable vexation at her in his heart. He felt himself a man grown now, and full of sap. A wife was only one part of the complex and fascinating business of living.

He was late at the office in the morning, as they had overslept. There was something heavy against the door, so that he could scarcely open it, and, on entering, he almost fell over the lifeless form of John Poole.

He had come back to the office after his birthday party, and had been at work. The light still shone over his drawing board. He had died here, alone, and Will, even in that first shock, was full of the knowledge that his death had come, not alone in the night but with the loss of his gift.

Yet on the drawing board was a picture—his last. It was different from his other work. It was a bend in the stream with a great tree overhanging the water and the meadow beyond and the figures of half a dozen small boys naked and white in the sunshine, playing about the tree and on a springboard caught beneath a great root. There was in it no mockery, no satire, no clowning. It was simple, kind. Staring at it, before he went to give the alarm, Will felt sure that this work of the skilled pencil was the externalization after half a century of some remembered scene of his boyhood.

Will grieved honestly for John Poole and thought often and mysteriously about that last picture. If John Poole could draw like that, why had he never done so? The answer to this was disturbing.

Will established his rights to Poole's cartoon ideas only to find them worthless. Contracts ran out, strips piled up unused, and he found himself working against a vast indifference, more crushing, more impenetrable than that which he had fought for a place for Poole's strip. But his new inner activity carried with it such personal joy that he could not be sufficiently chagrined by the collapse of his business enterprise and the danger to his income.

CHAPTER XI

The Rift in the Lute

"I think you'd better go to Pastano's, don't you, Ernestine?" Will asked one night in June. The children sat at the supper table with them, and the heat, turning more sultry with dusk, was already stifling.

"It's one way of getting rid of us," said Ernestine, a quality of familiar bitterness in her voice.

Will made no answer for a moment, then he said, with more gentleness than had become his wont, "I think perhaps it'll be a good thing for all of us. It will give me a chance to work out some ideas here in the house alone, check. "You're so strange, and so difficult. I know it's hard for you, but I'm doing all I can."

"Are you?" she asked, and smiled in a secret annoying way.

Will's temper rose within him. "You think I'm not?"

"Did I say that?"

"Yes—practically—yes, you did. Your tone—"

"Oh, then I must be careful even of my tones?"

He flung his hands up in a gesture of despair, and made no further effort to woo her. After a moment she turned to him with her great tragic eyes.

"You know that I don't care how poor we are. I can do without everything—you know it isn't material things."

But Will had withdrawn his effort at conciliation. He knew that she was talking about his secrecy over his drawings. Well, he could not share with her what was so ephemeral that a stray thought in his own head destroyed it. He couldn't talk about it. All the strong instinct of self-preservation for the gift that was developing within him forbade it utterly. The processes he was trying to put upon paper were nebulous. He was acutely fearful for them. If Ernestine did not like them, they would be destroyed.

"Don't open that suitcase, Peter," said Ernestine, and they went out and got into the car, bags and all.

They met Madame Pastano and her tall, silent, handsome husband, whose expressive eyes glanced at once to Ernestine's with a penetrating look. Will went into the coach with them, kissed them all goodby, and went away.

The children waved to him from the windows, but he did not look back, hastening off through the gate, his very back eager and relieved.

Ernestine leaned back against the cushion and closed her eyes against Madame Pastano's friendly curiosity. Through everything that had happened to them they had been in love, until these last few months. Would she ever have Will again as she had had him once—his tender love, his gentle passion, his strength? Not if she kept on striking and wounding him, common sense told her. But she sighed with helplessness. In the face of her knowledge the starvation at her heart for the old love, the old confidence and affection between herself and Will, she could not control her pride, her desire for revenge. The word brought her up short. Revenge? What had she to revenge? Will had not harmed her. Bewildered, she could not understand by what steps they had come into this impasse. Yet there they were. The condition, however unreal its beginnings, was now real enough. It was beyond her knowledge, or his either, that the rift in the lute had been simultaneous with the awakening to activity in Will of a true creative gift.

CHAPTER XII

The Death Car

"If you came home again your father would make a settlement upon you. He thinks you fear that the money would destroy your marriage. But if you came home, he would do it for you."

"I wouldn't leave Will. I'm still of the same mind that money doesn't solve problems."

"But, Ernestine, think how nice it would be for you to be home again. It isn't as though you were happy. We can see that you aren't. We can all see such a change in you this summer. And another baby! Of course, it's your own affair, but Lillian and your mother would be so delighted. It's impossible for us to be friends with Will. We've tried."

Ernestine smiled scornfully and glanced at Loring with such disdain that he flushed.

"Never mind," he said, "you don't know how we have tried. You don't know. Will doesn't appreciate you at all. I don't care what you say."

They were lying in the sand on the beach at Langley lake. Mrs. Pastano's gaudy white and green summer house reared its red roof back of them. The water was very shallow at this point so that the children could run in and out of it.

"Oh, Ernestine, if you would come home, we would be so good to you," Loring's voice implored her.

"We?" she asked, turning to look at him. "Is it that you want me back in the family circle or that you want to break up Will's home?"

"I think he is by way of breaking up his own home," he said slowly, weighing his words, moving cautiously against her loyalty to Will. "I understand that he hasn't written to you since you came down here four weeks ago. Maybe he wouldn't be sorry to be free."

Ernestine laughed at this, and he said solemnly:

"At this time such neglect must seem cruel to you."

"I wish," she exclaimed impatiently, "that people were able to ignore my so-called 'delicate condition.' After all, Will has his own problems. Let's not talk about it. Probably he hasn't written because he has no news to write about."

Loring was persistent and presently he took up the matter again from a different point of attack.

"It's wonderful what a little money can do for children. I've noticed Elaine every time I've been down this summer. She's so happy here—by the cool water—"

Ernestine wondered why she listened to him. Certainly the child had responded to the opportunities of the lake shore, the sleeping porch, the cool nights and sunny days. But not even for Elaine would she go back on Will—on her marriage.

If only Will would write to her! Her longing for some word from him was intolerable. She felt that if she did not hear from him she would leave the children behind and go to Chicago. Twice she had made all her arrangements for such a trip, but both times pride had held her back. If anything happened to him, the neighbors would know. She wrote to Mrs. Pryor once a week or so. Will wanted to be alone. He wanted the tie between them to be in abeyance. She could not go after him. Not now.

"Oh, Ernestine, my dear little sister," Loring pleaded with her, seeing her tears, being unable to suppress his feelings. "Why do you keep yourself tied to him, when he has brought you only unhappiness? You have done everything for him—everything. What have you had from your marriage but poverty and child-bearing and distress? He needs to be awakened—he doesn't realize what you have meant to him."

She was listening to him now, for the first time, and her heart trembled under the dark suggestions of his words. If she could hurt Will, as he had hurt her!

Precepts of Franklin Should Be Remembered

The proposed $5,000,000 Philadelphia memorial to Benjamin Franklin should have some place in it calling attention to that American's 13 suggested virtues and precepts, on which the club of Washington and Sioux City, Iowa, patterned after the Junet club of Franklin's day, are founded, says the Pathfinder Magazine. They are:

"Eat not to dullness, drink not to elevation. Speak not but what may benefit others or yourself, avoid trifling conversation. Let all your things have their places; let each part of your business have its time. Resolve to perform what you ought, perform without fail what you resolve. Make no excuse but to do good to others or yourself, i. e., waste nothing. Lose no time; be always employed in something useful; cut off all unnecessary actions. Use no hurtful deceit, think innocently and justly and, if you can see that you aren't. We can all see such a change in you this summer. And another baby! Of course, it's your own affair, but Lillian and your mother would be so delighted. It's impossible for us to be friends with Will. We've tried."

Tolerate no uncleanness in body, clothes or habitation. Be not disturbed at trifles, or at accidents, common or unavoidable. Be chaste. Imitate Jesus and Socrates."

Ivy has so long been used as a symbol of close and undying affection that it is uncomfortable to find a controversy going on as to how to kill and exterminate this "pestiferous plant."

It is a beautiful thing, ivy; its leaves are exquisitely shaped; its color is satisfying. Yet we are told now to look upon it as an enemy both to buildings and trees. All the same, I know walls covered thick with ivy where I used to locate birds' nests, which I shall always regard with affection. And I have known trees smothered by ivy which were far less pleasant to look on than the creeper which deprived them of life.—Montreal Family Herald.

She Knew

From Sunday's dinner mother served a mixture that evening that tasted good. "What's this?" Dad asked. "That's goulash," mother answered.

"Oh," said little Hetty, "I know what that is. I wear one on each foot when it rains."

Reduction of railroad rates, permitting delivery of needed California commodities to drought stricken livestock districts of the Middle West as a means of minimizing threatened economic loss was announced by George H. Hecke, state director of agriculture. Hecke praised the transcontinental lines entangling California for lowering freight rates. Prompt delivery of feed from California, he said, should enable farmers in drought districts to carry their livestock through the critical period.

A claim for $15,000 damages for the alleged drying up of springs on their ranch in Tuolumne county was presented to the Board of Supervisors at San Francisco by Edward H. and Edwin T. Jasper. The claimants charge that the water supply disappeared as a consequence of the construction of the Hetch Hetchy aqueduct adjacent to their property.

Proposed steps on the part of the Department of the Interior to have the county schools of Modoc county receive Indian students upon the abandonment of the government school at Fort Bidwell are meeting with county-wide opposition and protests against the move have been sent to Congressman Harry L. Reports from Sarah E. McCordle, county librarian, disclosed that Fresno county has the second largest county library system in the United States. The major portion of the growth has come in the last twenty years. The Fresno unit now has twenty branches and serves 170 schools. During the fiscal year 1929-30, according to the report submitted to the Fresno County Board of Supervisors, the library loaned 905,797 books. Of this total, 218,159 were accounted for by the city of Fresno.

The defunct First National Bank in Fresno reopened its doors recently to receive claims from depositors and creditors. Approximately 12,000 claims are expected. Preparatory to the actual payment of the 70 per cent dividend made possible by the purchase of the insolvent institution's bankable assets by the Bank of Italy, H. F. Schilling, receiver, has mailed blank forms and instructions for filing claims to all depositors and creditors. Although filing of the claims has begun, Schilling stated that proving of the claims and other necessary procedure makes it impossible to state when the money will actually be paid.

An agreement whereby Fresno county will take over the camp ground at Shaver Lake, the property of the Southern California Edison Company, and temporarily conduct it as a public camp ground, has been reached by E. R. Davis of Los Angeles, construction chief, and G. A. Campbell, local representative of the company, members of the Fresno County Board of Supervisors. Deputy District Attorney Arthur Shepard and A. Benedict, Sierra Forest Supervisor. The plan, adopted until a survey may be negotiated, calls for the taking over of the site by the county without cost. The agreement includes equipment and personal property valued at $14,000. All gates and roads to the lake are to be left open, allowing the public free access to the vicinity at all times.

A new freightship service from the Pacific coast to principal continental ports was announced by the Intercoastal Line. Two motorships, the 12-knot Brindanger and the new 14-knot Heranger, will make the first sailings. The Brindanger will arrive on the coast early in September.

A HERO OF 1900

Just thirty years ago Calvin P. Titus, an Army bugler, was hailed as the outstanding American hero of the Boxer rebellion in China. He was the first to scale the wall of Peking when the city was taken by the allied troops of several nations.

For his bravery on that occasion he was given an appointment to West Point, where President Roosevelt later pinned the Congressional medal of honor on his breast.

Since then little concerning him has appeared in the press until a few days ago, when he was retired as a lieutenant-colonel at Fort Benning, Georgia, and returned to private life.

Like many another, Titus got his big chance through an unforeseen opportunity, which he promptly embraced. It is doubtful that he had a thought of self when he braved the Boxer hordes in a manner "above and beyond the call of duty."

While his exploit was in itself of no great importance so far as the success of the expedition was concerned, it showed his mettle as a soldier, and paved the way for his subsequent honorable career as an army officer.

It is to the credit of his superiors that they recognized his fine gallantry and saw that it was suitably rewarded.

No one should aspire to be President unless he can stand criticism from 123,000,000 people.

SOME CENSUS FACTS

Some interesting facts concerning the growth of the United States may be drawn from the 1930 census figures, which show a population of 122,729,615 for the forty-eight states and District of Columbia. The country's outlying possessions have approximately 15,000,000 additional persons.

In percentage of gain, California leads all the states with an increase of 64 per cent, Florida being second with 52 per cent.

New York state showed the largest gain in actual numbers, although its percentage of increase was only 21.

Montana is the only state to show a loss, amounting to 2 per cent. But the gain of several other states was very small, Arkansas, Virginia, North Dakota, New Hampshire, Maine, South Carolina, Iowa, Idaho and Vermont showing increased populations of only 5 per cent or less.

The first five states in population remain as before, being in order New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Ohio and Texas, but sixth place is now taken by California, which passed ahead of Michigan and Massachusetts.

It is estimated that 60 per cent of the entire population of the United States is now urban, that is, living in cities and towns of 2,500 or more. In 1920 the urban population was only 51.4 per cent. This trend from country to city is perhaps the most significant single fact disclosed by the 1930 census.

JANE ADDAMS IS 70

Among the world's earnest and effective social workers, Miss Jane Addams, 70 years old on September 6, stands in the front rank. Few women in this or any other country have led a more active or useful life.

Born in Cedarville, Illinois, in 1860, she had the advantage of an exceptional education gained both in America and Europe. In 1889, with Ellen Gates Starr, she opened the social settlement of Hull House in Chicago, of which she has since been the head resident.

In connection with this and other enterprises her whole life has been devoted to bettering the condition of the poor and the degraded, a work in which she has been highly successful. In recognition of her humanitarian efforts she has been given honorary degrees by several colleges and universities, being the first woman ever to be so honored by Yale.

Miss Addams has always taken a lively interest in public affairs. She has been president of the Woman's International League for Peace, president of the National Conference of Charities and Corrections, vice-president of the National Woman's Suffrage Association, and has held many other positions of a similar nature.

While her pacifist activities have been criticized by some, her earnestness in behalf of downtrodden humanity is recognized and praised by all.

Jane Addams may look back upon her three score years and ten with all the satisfaction which springs from the contemplation of a well-spent life.

SMALL HOMES IN DEMAND

Modern household equipment is enabling many families to live in much smaller space than was thought possible a few years ago, according to government and other experts who have lately studied current trends in housing and home-making.

While individual homes have always been the rule in smaller cities and towns, until recently the tendency in the larger cities has been toward apartment living. But now the privacy and convenience of the small home presents an appeal which is creating an immense demand for the one-family residence.

This is due, it is said, to the fact that household efficiency heretofore possible only in the highly organized apartment is now available to the detached small dwelling, through the development of modern electrical equipment.

Of more than one hundred household duties required to be performed by women, about sixty may now be done by machinery. As a home economic expert recently said:

"Electrical refrigerators eliminate the cumbersome ice-box; modern ranges do away with the coal scuttle; in a porcelain tub washer clothes are spun dry for the line without a wringer; vacuum cleaners avoid the dust and labor incident to wielding a broom. Spinner washers, ironing machines and dozens of other appliances help to make a compact and efficient little 'factory' of the home."

Best of all, these conveniences conserve the housewife's health and strength, preserve her youthful beauty and make the whole family more comfortable and happy.

NEW BUSINESS TRENDS

If it is true that politics makes strange bedfellows, it is equally true that something similar may be said of business, in the light of recent happenings.

Manufacturers of various commodities are adding lines apparently unrelated to their original products, some of the new combinations being almost incongruous at first glance. For illustration:

A big automobile manufacturing concern has added refrigerators and radio sets; a yeast company takes on coffee as a companion product; an old sewing machine firm brings out a vacuum cleaner; while two piano manufacturers are also now building motorboats.

Perhaps these firms, as well as others making similar departures from their original lines, each have a special explanation for the new activities mentioned, each logical enough from the standpoint of the company concerned.

The general idea is believed to be that by making two or more products a manufacturer is better enabled to cope with seasonal slumps and in many cases to keep working forces on a more uniform schedule of employment.

Whatever the explanation, the new trend is interesting, and seems likely to spread to many other lines of manufacturing and marketing.

Congresswoman Rogers wants prettier uniforms for our soldiers. If there is to be no more war we might as well make them entirely ornamental.

Miniature golf is solving the unemployment problem. It takes half of the unemployed to build them and the other half to play on them.

GOOD NEWS

The Federal government estimates that $1,750,000,000 will be spent on the nation's roads this year—about $250,000,000 more than in 1929.

This is good news. As the San Francisco Chronicle remarks, road building is one field in which production can not run ahead of consumption. Every year witnesses increased motorization of all industrial and social activities. Multitudes of new cars come onto the highway resulting in a congestion that can be relieved only by building more roads.

It is hoped that a large part of the $1,750,000,000 will be spent on the construction of secondary, or farm-to-market roads. During recent years splendid highways have been built between the cities of the United States. But rural districts, for the most part, must still depend on the type of road that was in existence back in the horse-and-wagon age. There are 6,250,000 American farmers and a well known agricultural authority estimates that 5,000,000 of them are cut off from their markets and from contacts with the outside world during a part of each year by muddy, impassable and unimproved roads. Such a condition must be remedied if agriculture is to keep up with the march of progress.

There is still another important side to the question of road building—it is one of the best and least expensive ways we have of relieving unemployment. Highway construction is of direct benefit to everyone.

AN OLD-TIMER'S DIARY

An article in the Country Home presents an interesting sidelight on the views and habits of an old-time Delaware legislator, Hon. E. Sutton, who is credited with being the father of that state's excellent school system.

Sutton was a member of the state assembly more than 100 years ago, in 1823 to be exact, and like many of his day and since, he kept a diary in which his acts and impressions were recorded. Some excerpts follow:

"Jan. 17, 1823: Attended state general assembly. Favor school bill. Paid three levies for oats for horse. Got some fine gin today. Took some home in my saddle-bags. I believe in education."

A few days later he wrote: "Roads muddy as hell. Brought home one half gal. fine rye."

On January 25, 1823, he made this entry:

"Roads worse than yesterday. General assembly killing time. Sammy Varden gave me a Qt. of prime brandy today. Planning to pass school bill tomorrow."

The school bill was passed, and the rough and ready legislator who mixed liquor and learning was correspondingly happy.

HEARSE BOOTLEGGERS

Instances of bootleggers using hearses for transporting their contraband product have been noted in the American press, in one Detroit case an entire "funeral" procession, including the hearse and cars of the "mourners" having been found full of liquor.

A similar incident is reported from Italy, where a Mussolini edict forbids the baking of bread whiter than the prescribed "economy loaf" made of either whole wheat or a mixture of wheat and other grain.

As a hearse passed slowly through the streets of Naples, Fascisti police sniffed the odor of fresh bread emanating from the funeral car and pounced upon the luckless "undertaker." Finding the hearse filled with pure white loaves, he was promptly lodged in jail, while his wealthy customers waited for him in vain.

To make matters worse, a list of these customers was found on the culprit's person, and they were at last accounts nervous through fear of being arrested also.

The moral of all this would appear to be: Don't try to pull off a funeral without a real corpse.

THE ALIMONY CLUB

Three Chicago men, who apparently suffer from the pangs of alimony, are seeking to incorporate a new society, to be known as the Alimony Club of America. Judging from its professed aims, it might be more appropriately called an anti-alimony club.

Anyway, among its objects, as declared in the articles of incorporation, is this:

"To protect men and society generally against the so-called modern woman who considers marriage a mere step incident to a suit for a divorce, that she may engage in the business of collecting alimony."

If the new organization could guarantee that this object was possible of attainment there would probably be a grand rush of alimony victims eager to enroll under its banner.

DID YOU EVER STOP TO THINK?

By E. R. WAITE, Shawnee, Okla. That all the advantages imaginable can not make a business great unless its owners realize the importance of continuous advertising and use its service in the development of business.

When a business concern fully realizes the value of advertising, nothing will retard its growth.

Quality, continuously advertised, will supply the business needed by any concern.

The good will of the public is the most valuable asset any business can have. Continuous advertising is a builder of good will.

Business concerns that have a desire to give their customers satisfaction and meet their every requirement prove that fact by continuous advertising.

Advertising through the printed page is the most pleasing sales service that can be given the public.

Advertising pays in good will and in profits. It tells the public the practical and distinctive features of merchandise and service.

Advertising is always busy building better business for the concern that enlists its services.

Advertising is of universal help. It serves everybody everywhere.

NEWSPAPER ADS ONLY

One of the most significant and practical tributes ever paid to newspaper advertising is seen in the recent decision of Fox theatres in about 150 American cities to use newspaper advertising exclusively in future.

Heretofore Fox managers have been permitted to exercise their discretion in handling advertising appropriations—using newspapers, direct mail, billboards, radio, and other mediums as they saw fit. Now an order has gone out from headquarters that only newspapers are to be employed in the dissemination of Fox advertising.

It is significant that the great Roxy theater in New York, the outstanding success in the history of entertainment, has never used any medium of advertising except newspapers. The success of the Roxy is said to have largely influenced the Fox interests in making the decision to adopt a similar policy.

Her Majesty The Modern Woman

IT'S a far cry back hundreds of years ago when woman was considered a chattel and endured the hardships of slavery and serfdom. Nor is there a more encouraging development for the future welfare of humanity than the continual evolution and development of woman. Through the ages we have heard of Woman's Sphere, and, with the passing of the years, this sphere has been a constantly enlarging one until today the Woman's Sphere practically encompasses the entire realm of activities that were formerly to be found only in the man's world.

Her majesty, the modern woman, stands on a basis of equality with man and is found in the front ranks as the leader in some of our most progressive movements. She is the mainstay of the three greatest factors in community life: the Home, the Church and the School. While man is still the major breadwinner, yet one-fifth of all persons, gainfully occupied, are girls and women. So well have they served modern industry, business and professional life could ill afford to do without them.

The greatest contribution that woman makes to America and to the community is in her role as wife and mother. She cares for the children, keeping constant watch over them and guiding them through their infancy and adolescence. She keeps the home, that great sanctuary of American life, and fosters the best interests of family life. Woman has much more to do with the Standard of living in the Home and for the family than does the man.

Although men are in the majority as wage earners, two-thirds of the family income is spent by women.

These expenditures are made in practically every field of activity. Today she is the chief customer of business. For example, women buy 78% of the pianos; 49% of men's socks; 81% of the groceries; 82% of department store merchandise; 98% of the silks; 78% of the drugs, 80% of the jewelry. An odd list, picked at random, but typical of the important part played by women in our modern world.

By intelligent and careful expenditure, women are making a vast contribution to the furthering of thrift and saving in American life—and to them we look for the upholding of the Community Ideals of

HER MAJESTY, THE MODERN WOMAN

What a privilege to be a Woman of Today! How wide has grown her horizon! No longer is her life circumscribed by four walls. The modern woman is truly a Citizen of the World, intelligently participating in its affairs. Man, who was once prone to be alarmed over the imagined dire consequences if woman were given "free rein," has had occasion to change his views, for she has co-operated with him to make this a better world to live in.

Her influence is sought individually and collectively in politics, in commerce and in the arts. Her good will is of major importance in the distribution of the world's commodities. She is "up on things." She is eager to try what is new, not for the mere novelty of it, but to avail herself and her family of the best. She is open-minded to innovations, and if the market offers her something that is superior to what she has, she is willing to be shown. By an intelligent process of eliminating the inferior and substituting the superior, her home is constantly becoming more attractive and efficient. In always demanding the best, she stimulates competition, which is "the life of trade." A merchant knows that if he can prove to her that his article is better for the same or less money no false sentiment is going to make her cling to the old. Therefore merchants are kept alert, each striving to give milady better values, which has had a great deal to do with our present high standard of living. Her discriminating taste must be pleased. She sees to it that her home is pleasant, and that the meals she serves to her family and guests are rightly balanced and appetizingly prepared.

She studies child welfare and through Parent-Teachers' Associations co-operates with the schools in developing the children into finer citizens-to-be. Through club and church work she contributes her share to the betterment of the community she lives in.

She has not only kept step with progress, she has often been in the very vanguard, breaking new trails, doing "impossible" things because she didn't know they couldn't be done. You will find her holding her own in the professions—you will find her exploring the jungles and the uncharted northlands, you will find her in the laboratories of science, or winning her wings in aviation—in fact, she has invaded practically every field of activity from which she was once excluded, and is distinguishing herself in these various fields. No longer is her place exclusively "in the home," and yet her very emancipation has made her a better home-maker. She has learned scientific methods with which to banish drudgery, ill health and inharmonious, which were the results of her once abysmal ignorance.

She is interested in everything—through the radio, the library, the periodicals that come to her house, the clubs she belongs to, the shows she attends, the advertisements she reads, the shop window displays she studies for new ideas, she is kept constantly informed of what the world is doing.

She hates war, but in her country's crisis she gave of her time, her talent, her money and her sons. And now she is turning her energies into constructive and constructive channels. It is her hope that the world will see no more war—that men and women and nations will march together in the great Army of Progress. That harmony will reign over earth, and she is doing her part, which is no small one. In the humblest cottage you will find her trying to instill the ideals of health and beauty and cleanliness into the lives of her children that they may grow up with a normal, happy outlook on life.

Woman is a great leader in both home and community progress and development.

FEDERAL AID APPORTIONMENT FOR 1931-1932 IS ANNOUNCED

Federal aid apportionments for the fiscal year, 1931-1932, have been made available to the eleven Western states, subject to the approval of the Bureau of Public Roads, states a report received from Ben Blow, field secretary, National Automobile Club. The total amount to be apportioned aggregates $22,885,961.

In thus deciding to expedite the use of government money in road building, the Secretary of Agriculture was influenced greatly by the unemployment situation, and by the crop losses of the middle Western states that has been brought about through the recent drought. It is the hope of the department that the several states will endeavor to further the expenditure of these funds in compliance with the program outlined.

Of the eleven states, California will profit most, with $4,168,617, while Utah has the lowest apportionment $1,417,920. California's neighboring states do quite well, Oregon getting $1,986,112, Nevada receiving $1,601,408, while Arizona draws $1,770,317.

Co-operating with the government, the several highway commissions of the various interested states are busily engaged in developing road building projects which will tend to make the next two years a record-breaking road construction period.

WASHINGTON CELEBRATION WILL HAVE NATIONAL SCOPE

The George Washington Bicentennial Commission is "trying to acquaint the entire United States with the idea of celebrating in their own towns during the year 1932," according to a statement of Representative Sol. Bloom of New York, an associate director of the Commission.

"This is not alone for Washington, D. C.," Mr. Bloom said. "We are sending out information to the newspapers and to the governors, and to the people of the states and towns and villages, sending out everything pertaining to this celebration."

Among the activities undertaken by the Commission, Mr. Bloom points out, are the preparation of moving picture scenarios dealing with the life of Washington, publicity work, preparation of directories for celebrations and pageants, distribution of badges and buttons, and preparation of pictures of Washington for distribution to the schools. With reference to the last item, it was said that the idea is to put the picture of Washington in every school room of the United States, and there are one million school rooms. The pictures are to be distributed through the various school superintendents and also through the National Education Association.

USE OF LONG DISTANCE TELEPHONE INCREASES

Use of long distance telephone facilities by the American people is steadily increasing. In the single state of New York, calls of this type averaged over half a million an hour during 1929, an appreciable gain over previous years.

The reasons for the increase probably are that such telephone service is being constantly improved and the cost lowered. Nowadays it is almost as usual for us to speak to some one in the next city or state as to some one in the next street.

With the growth and development of international telephony, it may be safely forecast that eventually it will be a commonplace for use to speak across the seas.

MORE FOR YOUR MONEY

The dollar which the American citizen earned in 1926, if he still has it, will purchase 15 cents more goods now than then, and it will purchase 14 cents more than the dollar earned a year ago, according to the Department of Labor's Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Those who get caught are easier to convince that honesty is the best policy.

THE WISE-CRACKER

Is any kiss worth $11,783? J. A. Fitzgerald of Stockton, California, might answer that apparently absurd question. Anyway, that's what a court says he must pay Julian Williamson, who was injured in an automobile wreck caused by Fitzgerald's losing control of a car when he kissed Mrs. Lucretia McConnell at her invitation.

We have heard much of late concerning propaganda for this and that. A writer in the Outlook thinks that almost everything we read or hear nowadays is propaganda for something or somebody. He says: "Perhaps the only definition of propaganda is anything which gives pleasure, aid or comfort to any special interest, past, present or future. That leaves little but Euclid and the multiplication table."

The Massachusetts Supreme Court has held that becoming 70 years of age is not incompatible with good behavior. A law to compel judges appointed for life or during good behavior to retire at the age of 70 was unconstitutional, according to the court's ruling.

Even those who make wine and home-brew come within the protection of the government when unscrupulous dealers try to put something over on them. The Department of Agriculture's inspectors see that grapes sold have the proper content of sugar, and the Federal Trade Commission has romped on a manufacturer for saying his malt was made from imported hops when only one-eighth of the natural product was imported.

Traffic officers are generally considered to be rather hard-boiled, especially by those who happen to run afoul of them. But at least one of them, Sergeant Joseph Schneider of St. Louis, who died recently, had a kind heart off duty, whatever may have been his attitude in a traffic jam. During his lifetime he adopted and reared 35 poor children.

It seems that in spite of our boasted school system the United States has more illiteracy than several other leading nations. Examinations during the World War disclosed that one American out of four was unable to read with any degree of accuracy. Contrast this with the report that in France only three out of a hundred were illiterate, in England there was only one illiterate out of a hundred, while in Germany only one out of every 500 soldiers was illiterate.

A young, unidentified robber killed recently by Detective Thomas Burns of New York after a series of daring hold-ups, exhibited a queer mental twist. Although he had terrorized a section of the city for some time, the only "weapon" found on the robber's person was a toy pistol, with which he had intimidated his victims.

Fellow writers are having a great time razzing Henry L. Mencken, editor of the American Mercury, who has consistently maintained that men who marry are more or less feeble-minded. Mencken's engagement to Miss Sarah Powell Haardt, also a writer, has been announced, and they will be married on September 2.

The world's champion "daylight savers" are the Arctic terns, those graceful birds which breed near the North Pole and spend their winters near the South Pole, thus taking advantage of nearly six months of daylight at each end of the earth. Their annual round trip covers some 22,000 miles, and they enjoy more daylight than any other living creatures.

Fossils have disclosed that the progenitors of the modern horse were no larger than a fox. But those early ancestors lived millions of years ago. Now comes a breed of modern tropical opossums to astound the zoological world. A tiny opossum no larger than a mouse, with nine babies clinging to her fur, was found concealed in a bunch of bananas received by a grocer in Waco, Tex., and presented to the zoology department of Baylor University.

How the mighty have fallen! H. L. Mencken, debunker, iconoclast, reviewer of Babbitts and disparager of women, has met just retribution, and at the hands of Montgomery, Ala., at that—Montgomery, with substantial claims of being the capital of the famed Southern "bible belt." Not only has H. L. M. announced his intention to marry a Montgomery girl, but he has been made an honorary member of the Montgomery Kiwanis Club. Napoleon had his Waterloo; Mencken has his Montgomery.

Put a little sugar into what you say, and take a little salt with what you hear.

RELIEF FROM CURSE OF CONSTIPATION

A Battle Creek physician says, "Constipation is responsible for more misery than any other cause."

But immediate relief has been found. A tablet called Rexall Orderlies has been discovered. This tablet attracts water from the system into the lazy, dry, evacuating bowel called the colon. The water loosens the dry food waste and causes a gentle, thorough, natural movement without forming a habit or even increasing the dose.

Stop suffering from constipation. Chew a Rexall Orderlie at night. Next day bright. Get 24 for 25c today at the nearest Rexall Drug Store. Edwards' Drug Store, Mission street, near San Jose avenue. —Adv.

FARM EXPERTS ON TOUR

The recent visit of 14 American agricultural leaders to Chile was virtually another good will tour for the betterment of our relations with South America. The party was composed of heads of agricultural colleges, soil expert and others interested in the advancement of farming.

While in Santiago the party attended a centennial celebration of the first exportation of nitrate of soda to the United States and Europe in 1830. An incident of the celebration was the unveiling of a memorial tablet in recognition of the distinguished record of Chilean nitrate of soda in world agriculture.

Owing to revolutionary improvements in mining and refining processes adopted by American interests in Chile, the nitrate industry has been modernized with a view to even greater service to the agriculture of the world.

The visit of this party of Americans to participate in the anniversary and study the new methods which have been adopted is an indication of the importance attached to these recent developments by agricultural leaders of the country.

Aside from the special objects of the tour, it has been another manifestation of the growing friendship between the United States and Latin-America.

Now that the debunkers have had a long inning, it is time that they should be debunked.

Banishing illiteracy has one drawback. If all were literate, where would we get some of our jurymen?
